Field of the Invention The present invention relates to a floating gate type nonvolatile memory cell used in a flash EEPROM (electrically erasable programmable read-only memory). In particular, the present invention relates to a floating gate type nonvolatile memory cell having a LDD region, in which a semiconductor junction region is used as an impurity diffusion region of a low-concentration type. 2. Description of the Related Art A high integration of a flash EEPROM has been increasingly required, and a variation of the memory cell size becomes severe. Therefore, a fabrication process must be highly sophisticated. In addition to this requirement, the following problems arise with respect to the conventional EEPROM: (1) For a highly integrated flash EEPROM, a short-channel effect arises from a demand for a further decreased element size. Therefore, a depletion layer is increased, which leads to an increase in the leakage current. The short-channel effect is remarkable especially for the nonvolatile memory cell having the LDD region. (2) In the conventional EEPROM, an impurity diffusion layer for source and drain regions is formed in a self-aligned manner (e.g., M. Natali et al., IEEE Transactions on Electron Devices
